From Publishers Weekly

An amusing, at times strident narrative voice drives Pollero's third Palm Beach puzzler (after 2008's Knock 'em Dead). Pert paralegal Finley Anderson Tanner is stunned when her divalicious mother, Cassidy Johnstone, sells her the beachfront house once owned by Finley's late beloved stepdad, Jonathan Tanner, for $25,000. Discouraged by the renovations needed on the property, Finley finds support from such friends as interior designer Sam and annoying if hunky PI Liam McGarrity. Nothing prepares her, however, for the literal skeleton in the closet—the remains of a girl clutching a medallion Finley gave Jonathan when she was a child. Finley's frantic efforts to stay romantic and fashion forward while seeking to identify a homicide victim and catch a nefarious killer make for an interesting mix. (Mar.)

Finley Anderson Tanner knew there had to be a catch when her mother offered to do her a “favor” by selling her an old cottage in Palm Beach for considerably less than market value. Of course, Finley thought the reason the deal was so great was because the house needs major renovation. Once Finley takes ownership, though, she discovers something that wasn't in the contract: a skeleton in the closet. Finding out who put the unwanted addition in her new dream home will take some work, but fortunately for Finley, she has the help of annoyingly sexy private investigator Liam McGarrity and her new boss, the just-as-hot Tony Caprelli. Amateur detection and designer shopping on a discount play equally entertaining roles in the third installment in Pollero's addictively acerbic chick-lit mystery hybrid series featuring Florida paralegal Tanner.
